From the White House to 10 state capitals, the outcomes of the upcoming November elections can have a significant impact on corporate organizations and how the government may pursue enforcement of regulations. From a bipartisan viewpoint the leaders of Cozen O'Connor's State AG Group will evaluate what the next presidential term could mean for the regulatory environment, and review the candidates for state attorney general across the country. With state AGs as the new champions of federalism — taking strong positions to either challenge or support the administration in power—the role of AGs will continue to be critical, whoever prevails in November.
