Ralf Rodriguez will present a course on construction lending during the Florida Bar's Construction Law Certification Review.

A construction lender is defined as "any person who loans money to an owner for construction of an improvement to real property, who secures that loan by recording a mortgage on the real property, and who periodically disburses portions of the proceeds of that loan for the payment of the improvement. Almost all construction projects require more than out-of-pocket funding from the owner. Accordingly, it is important for those who practice construction law to be aware of and understand the various nuances, problems, and pitfalls pertaining to construction lending.
